William Wall's "Birth of the Whaling Industry": This painting, as well as several others of the New Bedford artist's work, hangs in the Free Public Library.

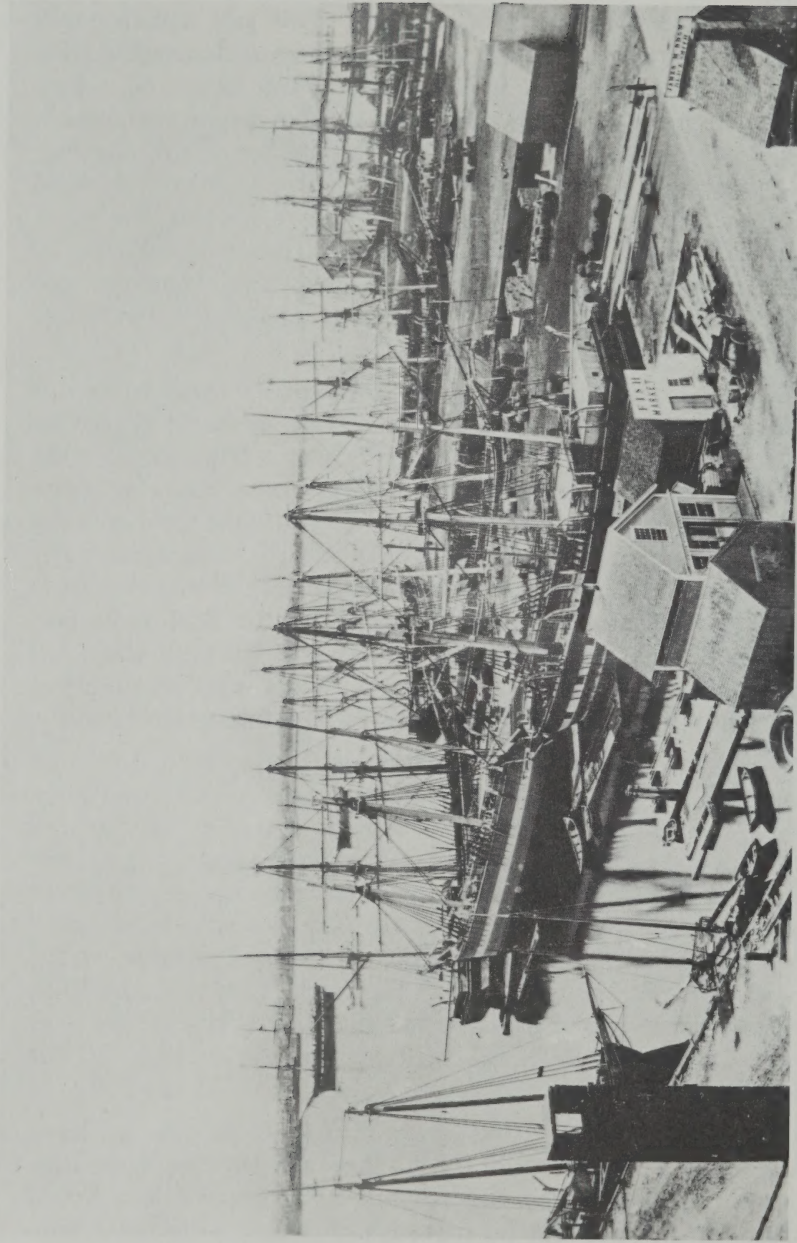

This list of logs and journals is the first publication of materials held in the Melville Whaling Room. As the reader peruses this list, he will see names and dates. Nothing in this list will serve to fire the imagination or lead one to feats of derring-do. Yet, the days and years that these logs represent have many a tale to tell. Few jobs a man could do were as physically hard as whaling. While sailing and searching for the whale, the watch schedule was four hours on, four hours off. But, when the whale was sighted, no man slept or ate till that whale was struck, towed to the ship, cut in, tryed out and stowed. Hard bread, salted meat, and molasses for your coffee — this is what a man would eat. The hard life, and the harder work, the chance that death was just a roll of a wave away — these made no difference. Romantic? Glamorous? No — by no means. Rather a dirty, hard, crude life. Pay? Many men came back owing the ship money so they had to sign on for another voyage to pay their debts.

From this list, one can find these days and years. And from this list, even a greater story unfolds. For no industry was quite so important in the building our nation as was the whale fishery. The money that came from the oil and bone was used to build railroads, factories, open gold mines, and to help start many industries. Few industries had such a part in the history of our nation as the whale fishery. From the early Nantucket whalers, to the three ships (one from New Bedford, two from Nantucket) that were relieved of their cargo of tea in Boston harbor, to the great age of discovery and pushing westward, through the Civil War, and up through World War I, when sperm oil was a war commodity — the whale fishery had a part in every important phase of American history.

Yet, few if any of these whalemens spoke of their role in American history. It was a job; it was a business. Those men are all gone now. Yet in these logs and journals, they have left us a day to day record of life. These logs were kept by the mates, while the captain might keep a personal journal. The log kept a running record of winds, course, ships seen, and all other pertinent activities from the day the ship sailed until it returned to port. The language is simple ;the method prosaic. (One example of this is an entry from the log of the Bark "Platina". In 1902, one of the "Platina's" boats struck and killed the only white whale ever taken. But no mention is made of the whiteness of the whale. To the whalemens, a whale was a whale).

This, then, is the collection of log books and journals now on hand in the New Bedford Free Public Library. There are two separate lists. The first, lists those logs owned by the Library. The second is a list of logs not owned by the Library but by private individuals who have been so kind in allowing the Library to microfilm their logs so that we may have their logs on file for research purposes. To these individuals, we are greatly indebted.

New Bedford Harbor, circa 1860. At least fifteen whaleships may be counted.
Today, the harbor accommodates another vast fishing fleet.

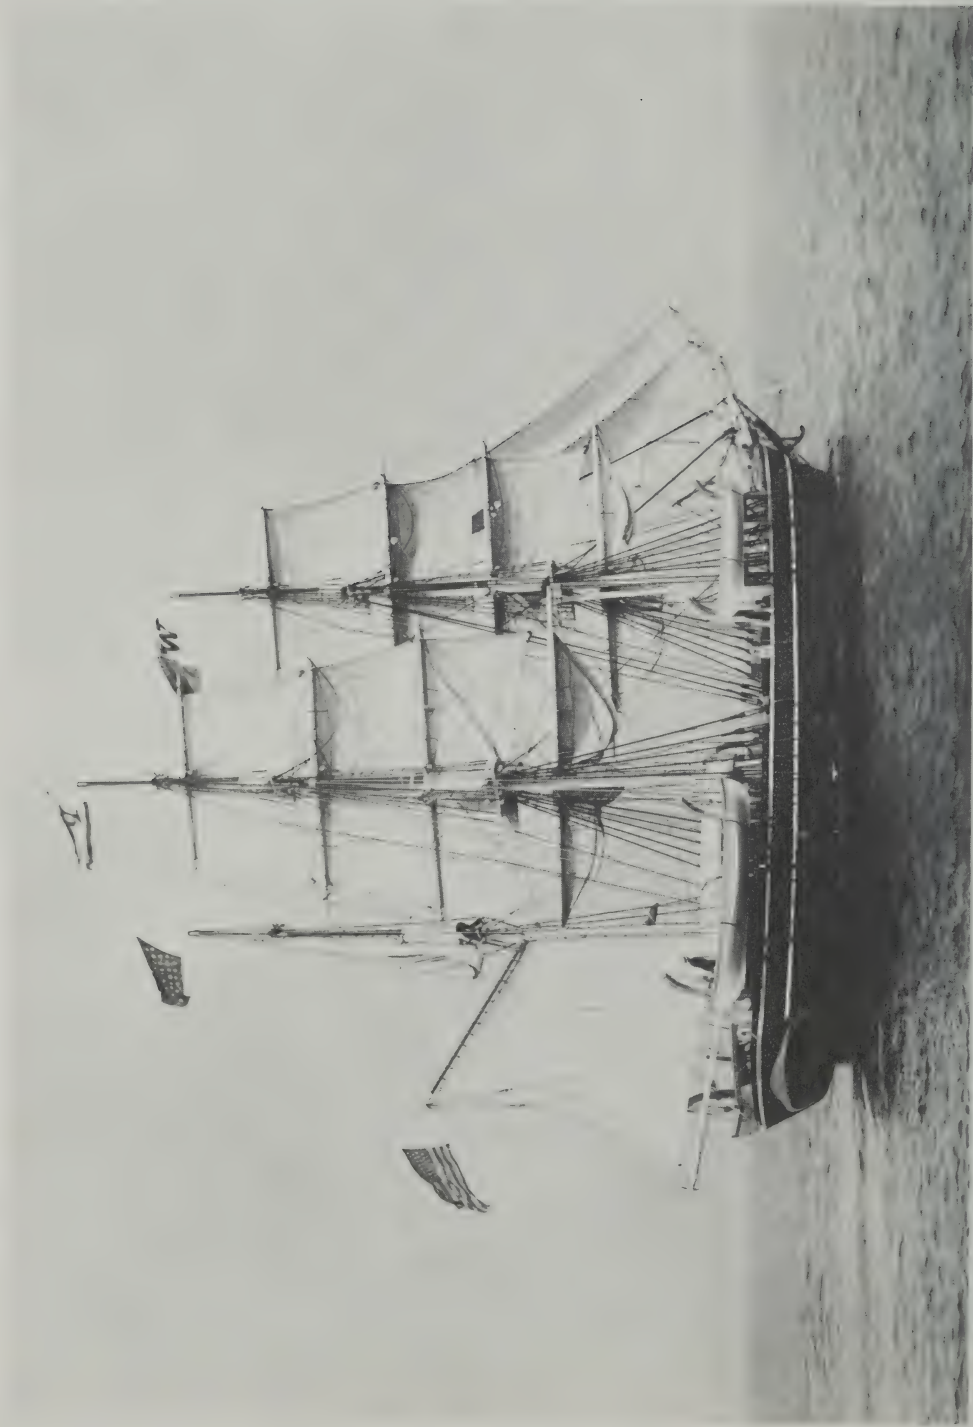

In addition to the listed log books and journals, the Library is extremely fortunate to possess the hand written abstracts of an additional 2,500 whaling voyages. These abstracts, although lacking the daily continuity of the logs and journals, contain notations of the more important aspects of the voyages. In general they list the sailing and return, the name of the captain with any changes during the voyage, the whaling "grounds" visited, the islands touched at, ships spoken as well as notes of any out of the ordinary occurrences. In addition, these abstracts contain a list of vessels lost or condemned from 1815 to 1862.

These abstracts, which cover the period 1831-1873, were compiled by Dennis Wood, Esq., a member of the firm of David R. Green & Co., whaling merchants. Samuel H. Cook, Esq. presented them to the Library in 1888. Mr. Wood was also a member of the Mutual Marine Insurance Co., the Merchants Insurance Co. and a director of the Merchants National Bank. It was for the use of these various interests that the abstracts were compiled.

JAMES S. HEALEY,

Librarian

Bark Platina, Captain Thomas McKenzie, outbound July 16, 1901. It was on this voyage, in August of 1902 that the only white whale in the history of whaling was taken.
